U.S. Gives Police Anti-Drug Aid Package

U.S. Ambassador Paul Trivelli traveled to the southern border crossing of Peñas Blancas earlier this month to oversee the transfer of a $160,000 anti-narcotics aid package to the National Police, as a sign of the United States' continually increasing confidence in Nicaraguan security and defense institutions.

The bulk of the aid went towards offsetting the expense of an already constructed vehicle-inspection center, though the package also included a $15,000 fiber-optic scope used to search for hidden compartments in

A dirt bike, the first of seven, was also part of the donation, which was given under the auspices of the U.S. State Department's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law-Enforcement Affairs (INL).

The United States has additionally promised to provide the Peñas Blancas facility later this year with an all-terrrain vehicle and $23,000 in security equipment to help stem the tide of narcotics and trafficked money across Nicaragua's borders.

So far, it has been a successful year for Nicaragua's anti-drug trafficking efforts.

Trivelli, in a local radio interview earlier this month, lauded the efforts of Nicaraguan law enforcement.

"Since last October, security authorities have seized some 19.9 metric tons of cocaine," he said, noting that the amount far exceeds the hauls of previous years.

Such tangible headway in the U.S.-led war on drugs may translate into more substantial rewards for the Nicaraguan police and military, which are already scheduled to receive more than $10 million in anti-trafficking assistance in a 2006-2007 aid package, Trivelli said.

There may be larger gifts to come.

Nicaragua's Armed Forces chief, General Omar Halleslevens, earlier this month made a public appeal for international aid to purchase several new airplanes to help the country intercept drug traffickers (NT, July 13). Those requests, although not yet made through formal diplomatic channels, may have already reached receptive ears in Washington, D.C.

Trivelli emphasized that the U.S. Department of Defense is aware of the needs of the Nicaraguan military, and that the State Department would follow-up on the matter. The ambassador added that the United States' "relationship with the military, I believe, is very, very positive."

Gen. Halleslevens has made other efforts to strengthen institutional military relations with the United States, including a visit to the Pentagon last month to strengthen ties with the U.S. brass (NT, June 15).

The positive relationship between the U.S. and Nicaraguan militaries is still a new and developing trend.

Formal military relations between the two countries began to strengthen in 2003, when Nicaragua sent a small contingent to join the U.S.-led attack on Iraq. The 115 Nicaraguan soldiers were withdrawn soon after, in February 2004, due to financial constraints.

Then, in March 2005, the United States temporarily suspended $2.3 million in military aid to Nicaragua pending the government's agreement to destroy all remaining Soviet-era surface-to-air missiles, known as SAM-7s (NT, April 1, 2005).

The Nicaraguan military has since agreed to destroy most of its stockpiled SAM-7s, but insists it will maintain enough in its arsenal for national defense purposes – an issue that could potentially be a future sticking point with the United States.
